the covid 19 pandemic altered consumption patterns significantly in a short period of time however official inflation statistics take time to reflect these changes in the weights of the cpi consumption basket using credit card data for the uk and germany we document how consumption patterns changed and we quantify the resulting inflation bias we find that consumers experienced a higher level of inflation at the beginning of the pandemic than what a fixed weight inflation or the official weight index suggests and a lower inflation thereafter we also show that weights can differ among age groups as well as between in person and online spenders these differences affect the purchasing power of the population heterogeneously we conclude that cpi inflation indexes based on frequently updated weights can provide useful inputs to assess changes in the cost of living and if shifts in consumption patterns prove persistent determine the need to introduce new official weights and inform monetary policy
