essay from the year 2007 in the subject politics general and theories of international politics grade 10 university of twente school of management and governance course international relations theory language english abstract writing an essay about andrew linklater s the transformation of political community is in light of the pre eminent praise it received in the academic sphere a distinct challenge is it actually possible to make critical statements about a book which others have called one of the most important books in international theory published in this decade or even the most impressive work of international theory to have been produced in britain since bull s anarchical society the mere quantity of laud is as impressive as its quality one easily tends to follow this blandishment and ignores that it is not more than base flattery beyond doubt linklater has produced a sound book which has after his preliminary publications the problem of community in international relations in 1990 and the question of the next stage in international relations a critical theoretical point of view in 1992 made him one of the strongest voices in contemporary international relations theory i hypothesize that the transformation of political community has already today only nine years after its first publication become a classic of international relations what defines a classic two factors are decisive and they are the same for a classic in international relations than they are for a classic car it is cherished by people and it has a unique selling point something that differs from everything that has been produced before using this definition an aston martin db 5 is a classic as well as kenneth waltz s man the state and war a classic as complete and coherent it might be is not necessarily without problems several times aston martin went bankrupt and was reborn again and for waltz s neorealism the sudden and peaceful collapse of the soviet union meant the end of its universal validity
